Relation between a teacher and children

The author criticises the modern teachers' practice of not engaging with children rather enjoying their company. If they develop an interest in children, the latter will become more responsive without any reluctance. However, if a teacher tries to enforce his conditioned interests on them, they will not cooperate with him. Furthermore, the duration of their class should not be too long as the children's company is wearisome and exhausting, it's not easy for an already burdened teacher to maintain his self-control but if he holds, even in that situation then no need of the rules in dealing with children except connection.
