

Passage:

In the modern world, the term education has acquired a much wider meaning than it had in the past. It no longer confines itself merely to reading, writing, and arithmetic. The true aim of education is to produce good citizens, capable of contributing positively to society. Education should develop not only the intellect but also the moral character and practical abilities of individuals. Unfortunately, in many countries, the system of education remains exam-oriented, encouraging rote learning instead of critical thinking. As a result, students are often ill-prepared for real-life challenges. A truly educated person is not the one who has read many books, but the one who applies knowledge wisely, behaves ethically, and serves humanity with sincerity.

Solve:

True Purpose of Education

In today's world, education goes beyond reading, writing, and arithmetic. Its true purpose is to develop morally upright and practically skilled citizens. But in many countries, the system promotes exam-based learning instead of critical thinking, leaving students unfit for real-life challenges. A truly educated person applies knowledge wisely, acts ethically, and serves humanity with sincerity.
