(5) Conclusion

"Good governance is key to sustainable development" (Kofi Annan). There are numerous progressive components reflected that good governance plays a cornerstone role in the national development. It stimulates foreign direct investment and trade cooperation among countries to accelerate economic growth and progress. Good governance ensures sustainable environmental measures and green and clean energy initiatives to combat climate change and mitigate extreme weather events. It ensures equal job opportunities to maintain equality and social justice. Moreover, by upholding rule of law and strengthening the judicial system to deter crime and curb criminal behaviour. It also works to eradicate discrimination and violence by guaranteeing access to free education and basic health facilities. Furthermore, good governance encourages innovation, research and discoveries to foster national development and social progress. It provides business opportunities and supportive framework to ensure economic stability and lasting prosperity. It protects constitutional and fundamental rights of marginalized communities. Transparent administration promotes nation integration, tolerance and provincial harmony to resolve conflict and prevent violence.

It enhances sense of accountability, transparency and fairness to decrease corruption, demerit and injustice. Therefore, proactive approaches are essential to build transparent governance system through e-governance, digital voting, human development, vibrant media, active community engagement and merit-based recruitment.
