

Title: A visit to Cherokee.

The writer wanted to visit a less crowded place during his vacations. His friend invited him for a trip to Cherokee. The writer accepted his invitation immediately. They took flight and visited an 18th century's historical town Qualla Boundary. Although there was language barrier yet the writer and his friend found out shops full of antique designs and traditional arts. An owner of a shop, George, welcomed them in a warm manner and invited them for lunch. George narrated about his struggles from a woodcutter to a shopkeeper. He told them about economy of Cherokee dependent on trade as well as crowd attracting "Bingo weekend". Their final stop in Qualla Boundary was a museum full of traditional handcrafts. After returning home, the writer missed Cherokee and eagerly looking forward to visit another place like Cherokee.
