The author asserts that modern educational theorists advocate the policy of non interference in the life of children, which is counterproductive. Children respond to instruction according to their treatment. If you take interest in their activities they are more likely to respond. Thus the teacher by showing affection can win the hearts of students. Teachers are often overburdened and frustrated and they are not able to build individual relationship with their students. As a result children get frustrated and do not develop positive attitude. Hence it is more important to have affection for children rather than frustration of forcing them to abide by rules.
