6. Conclusion:

Nelson Mandela once said that the education is the most powerful tool which one can use to change the world. But what happens when this weapon is priced beyond the reach of the poor? This dilemma surfaces every time when the question of privatizing the education takes place. There is no doubt that privation makes education more accessible. Teachers are accountable in private educational institutions. It also offers choice and diversity to students. Moreover, it attracts enough funding to run the operations. However, its disadvantages are more alarming. Privatization results in social inequalities and segregation of ~~classes~~. More children become at the risk of being out of school.

Governments are unable to fully regulate the private educational institutions as per the given policies. Moreover, privatization undermines the concept of getting education being a right and not a luxury.

Privatization of education can serve as a supplementary measure to support the ongoing education system.

However, relying on it as a long term policy plan is neither sustainable nor desirable.

Digital Democracy: Social Media and Political Participation

4. Way Forward:

4a) stronger data protection
and cyber laws

4b) Ethics-based digital literacy

4c) Regulation of political advertisements and campaigns

5. Conclusion:

Imagine casting a vote not at a polling booth, but through a secured mobile application, debating policies with people across the continents, and holding the politicians accountable with a single tweet. All these things are now possible because of social media.

Through social media, political participation has been increased. Public can now participate in policy making process. Also, social media can be used to spread awareness among masses. Voter turnouts are higher. Moreover, human rights can also be protected using social media. However, from manipulating voters using misinformation and propaganda to increased surveillance and lack of digital literacy, it also has some shortcomings. There is no doubt that public participation has strengthened digital democracy using social media.

However, responsible use of social media is a necessary measure to ensure unhindered democratic process.
