

The rapid expansion of urban centers in developing countries has created a paradox, where opportunities for employment and education appear abundant, yet the quality of life for the majority continues to decline as overcrowding, pollution, and inadequate infrastructure erode the very benefits that modernization is supposed to bring, and governments, struggling with limited resources often prioritize visible development projects, over long-term investments in health, education, and social welfare, thereby deepening inequalities and fostering discontent among citizens.

The rapid expansion of urban centers in developing countries has created a paradox, where opportunities for employment and education appear abundant, Yet, the quality for the majority continues to decline as overcrowding, pollution, and inadequate infrastructure erode the very benefits that modernization is supposed to bring, and governments, struggling with limited resources often <sup>prioritize</sup> visible ~~depts~~ development projects, over long-term investments in health, education, and social welfare, thereby deepening inequalities and fostering discontent among citizens.

Date .....

