Love and Affection for Children

Modern educational researchers offers less attention towards the positive impacts of interference with children. Children will respond more constructively if they are dealt with same affection as people have for animals. In contrast, it will be ineffective to use them for certain purpose. The desirable interest is the one in which teacher feels immediate happiness with children without any specific intention, leading to effective communication without inducing psychological damage. However, this kind of liking is almost impossible for overworked teachers. The author suggests that teaching should not be a full time job as irritation resulting from fatigue, finds a way to express itself. Self control alone cannot conserve friendliness but where it exists, unneeded rules should be avoided as they cannot substitute love and affection.
