A Memorable Trip to Cherokee
(During his May vacation), the writer and his friend visited

Cherokee, in Oklahoma, a place known for beautiful scenery. With the help of natives, they found a shop where they met George, a shopowner. George invited them for lunch. He explained that people of Cherokee depend on trade and seasonal activities for livelihood.

The writer also visited a museum where traditional arts and artifacts were displayed. After returning home, the writer missed Cherokee and looks forward to visit other exotic places.

The Harms of Misdirected Activity

The writer argues that evils of the world are caused not by laziness but by misdirected activity of busy people. He believes that absence of pause virtues like calmness and thinking, has made the world disordered. Referring to the historical event of 1914, he suggests that if the leaders had taken time to rest and think instead of acting hastily, the world would be a better place. He concludes that taking rest is necessary for mental health.
