

Human Rights

Human rights are the basic rights of every human being. These rights are vital for every individual regardless of race, social status, religion and gender.

In every society, there should be complete freedom for human rights. These basic rights are: equality before law, right to education, right to vote, right to marriage, and social rights. These rights are essential for dignity, peace and stability. Human rights is vital for promoting political stability, peace, and development. These basic rights gained promoting after the world war II, because international community wanted to protect the people from cruelty and oppression. United Nation ~~was~~ formed in 1948 for the decaloration of human rights. Every individual right is to be respected. These rights cannot be taken away from anyone under circumstances. In many parts of the world, human rights violation occurs due to poverty, lack of awariness in people. There is need of high demands of education, awariness, social justice in community for human rights.
