"Education is the most powerful weapon which you can use to change the world," says Nelson Mandela. Education is more than a system of learning, rather it is an agent of individual and social transformation. Educated and well informed societies progress through innovation and good governance. While uneducated societies remain trapped in vicious cycles of poverty, inequality and extremism. Education acts as a chainsaw and cut through the entrenched roots of social evils, paving the way for societal transformation. It provides intellectual empowerment and enlightens the society. Education spreads awareness about basic political rights of humans and strengthens democracy. The gap between the rich and the poor can be narrowed down by providing equal education to all the members of society. Education helps to make a society better by ending

all social evils. Education promotes peace and harmony by ending class gap and sectarianism hatred. However, there are many hurdles to education. The high cost of education makes it unaffordable for poor people. Poor infrastructure of schools is also a hurdle to education. This essay illustrates the role of education in shaping a better society and hurdles to education.

Firstly, education provides intellectual empowerment and helps to build a better society. Intellectual empowerment provides logical thinking to counter superstitions. It helps in developing critical thinking skills. According to UNESCO, societies with higher education levels demonstrate stronger critical consciousness and innovation. Hence, education provides intellectual empowerment which ultimately makes a society better.

Secondly, education helps transform into a better society by providing better understanding about basic human rights.

including civil rights as well as political rights. It has been observed that the educated societies have more political participation as compared to uneducated societies. In an educated society people are well aware of their basic rights including right of free speech. Those people can openly criticize wrong policies which forces the government to reconsider its decision. Thus, education shapes a better society by spreading awareness about basic human rights.

Moreover, education increases participation in government affairs which makes a better society. Educated people have more participation in electoral process. According to UNESCO, adults with tertiary education are 50-60% more likely to vote than those with only primary education. Voting helps people choose their own representatives. To summarize, education provides increased participation in government which helps to transform society.

Furthermore, education makes a society better by increasing human development rate. Education provides skilled and well informed labor. It increases the chances of human innovation in the field of science. World Bank reports, each additional year of schooling increases income by 8-10%. This increase in income helps in increasing development rate. To conclude, education makes a better society by increasing human development rate.

In light of the above discussion, this essay has elaborated the role of education in shaping a better society. Education transforms a society by eliminating gender based discrimination and violence. Education ends all social evils and makes the society better. Education provides knowledge which ends sectarian hatred. Education promotes peace and harmony. The high cost of education is a hurdle to democracy.
