

Working Man: from Destitution to Improved Quality of Life

The life of a working man improved drastically in this century. Previously, societies were divided rigidly in two classes. The ~~majority~~ minority rulers enjoyed substantial power and comfort. The majority workers, on the other hand, performed most of the work and had meagre political voice. With industrial revolution, massive production commenced. Besides, workers became dissatisfied with their poor conditions. The competition among factory owners to attract skillful labour improved the overall quality of life of workers. The low-standard factories were vulnerable to constant strikes by dissatisfied workers. Nevertheless, both workers and owners realized the dependency upon each other for livelihood.
