The Essay

When a country has 240 million people, fewer tax payers than a small European city, the problem goes beyond collecting money and becomes a failure of trust between citizens and government. Pakistan faces a critical movement where economic survival depends not on finding new resources but on convincing people to pay their fair share for the nation's progress. Tax culture, which means citizens willingly pay taxes as their national duty, barely exists in Pakistani society, creating a harmful cycle where low revenue leads to poor public services, which then discourages people from paying taxes, keeping the country stuck in poverty. The current situation shows disturbing facts: shopkeepers and traders run businesses without registering despite earning large incomes, citizens see their tax money being wasted through corruption and unnecessary spending, and honest taxpayers carry unfair burdens while tax
