

Consequences of Rural Migration to Cities

Rural migration of people to cities causes over-population in cities, spread of health hazards and living standards are becoming poor. Rural migration means that people move from villages to cities in search of livelihood, education and better opportunities. But this search of opportunities of rural leads to decreasing living standards in cities.

Rural migration leads to overpopulation in cities, which affects the capacity of cities. Overpopulation means that the services and opportunities which are supposed to be divided between some populations are now divided in large population. This increases the competition and lack of livelihood. Citizens are fighting for everything from basic necessities like clean water, food security to health services and security. Besides overpopulation, rural migration also causes spread of health hazards. When
