Q:2 Title:

Pakistanis cannot behind a revolution, because Pakistani cannot behind anything.

Anatol Lieven

Says in his book, "Pakistan A Hard Country" that only the moral and emotional pressures can destroy the discipline and unity of Pakistan and its army. The religious emotional pressure of Pakistan's army soldiers clashed directly with their obedience to their commanders. He further added, that if the US were to invade part of Pakistan, and the army command failed to give orders to resist this, then part of the Pakistani army would mutiny in order to fight the invaders. The result would be rebellion leading to Civil war, not as an Iran national revolution. Anatol Lieven adds further that regional identity may be growing in political importance. He further describes that Pakistani are as divided in identity as there is usually a wheel within a wheel, an identity within an identity. He wrote that Ali Hassan, a young Lahori said to him, that if he jump on a box and preach revolution, then because of Punjabi, people of all provinces cannot follow him. Then most of Punjabi and also most of the people of his tribe cannot follow him, because of identity. Ali further told him most Pakistani practice different kind of Islam and worship. Finally Ali told him that Pakistani cannot ^{unite} behind anything.
