The writer Anatol Lieven in his book "Pakistan A Hard Country", ~~give a perception that people in Pakistan cannot unite~~ to bring a significant change in system—such as revolution. For his claim, he ~~give~~ Put forward some arguments in favour. He ~~argues~~ He argues that any movement require a high degree of loyalty, obedience and unity among masses. However, the people in Pakistan are having strong ethno-linguistic, caste and sub-caste divides. He ~~argue~~ He argues that neither any civilian nor any military leadership can bring unity among masses because there is not only societal divides but also religious divides. If some leadership tries to together people under the slogan of Islamization, it ³ would also not work as the people are divided in many sects. Furthermore, the writer argues that if an extreme step is taken for revolution such as mutiny, it would turn into civilian-war instead because under no means—both societal and religious—Pakistani people would agree to obey other's ideologies or supervision
