Question no. 03

(A). Guderian was considered talented because he had a natural ability for initiative
 and leadership in the field.
 He had a knack for leading from the front, making decisions independently, and exhibiting strategic thinking, all of which contributed to his effectiveness
 as a commander. Additionally, his rebellious nature stemmed from his tendency to disobey orders.
 He believed his ^{own} strategies
 were more effective.

He believed in his own

(B). Guderian's offensive
 tactic involved leading Panzer

Forces in deep thrusts into enemy territory. He emphasized the strategic use of tanks to achieve breakthroughs, disregarding concerns about vulnerable flanks.

Supporting units like infantry and artillery and engineers were transported on trucks to maintain mobility and keep up with the tank core.

(C) ~~General~~ Guderian's disagreement with Hitler arose during Soviet Union Campaign. When the attack on Moscow faced challenges such as the Red Army's resistance and supply line issues, Guderian advocated for a retreat and transportation of the army across the Baltic Sea. However, Hitler opposed this idea and insisted on continuing the attack.

(D) Guderian's relief from Command turned out to be a fortunate turn of events. It spared him from potential involvement in war crimes, a fate that befell many other German generals. This break allowed him to avoid being implicated in unethical actions and ultimately preserved his reputation.

(E) If Guderian had not been relieved of Command, he ~~would~~ ^{Would have continued} have continued to lead the German forces in the war. His aggressive and independent tactics could have prolonged the conflict, potentially leading to even more devastating consequences and ~~an~~ an extended war timeline.
