Q7: Translation:

It is often said about books that they change the world. Intellectuals select their books according to their choices and circumstances.

Along with great books that change the world, there are certain books that misguided the world and lead to devastated conditions. Society can be judged by the books it publishes whether it will change. the world or will . . . try to keep it tied in the chains of tradition. If we review the books published in Pakistan, we can observe that those books are full of religious conflicts, sectarianism and unwarranted nationalism which affect people's minds. This mentality can be seen in Pakistan nowadays .

Q2: Précis:

Art, which was originally rooted in religion and magic, has transformed into commercial enterprise. Throughout the history, art has been funded by the wealthy class of the society. The business and commodification of art reached to its peak in 1980s during Japan's "bubble economy". The Japanese investors poured record amount of money into renowned Western masterpieces.

Ryoji Saito bought van Gogh's portrait of Dr. Gachet for a staggering $82.5 million. He did it only to disappear it from the public eye. When he discovered he owed significant taxes, this controversial statement about taxes was declared as joke later. The artwork is becoming inevitable business. Only a few institutions like the J. Paul Getty Museum,

It established by a billionaire oilman have means to compete the art of top class. Art may end up in private hands. It will serve as means of investment and business for the investors.
