"Art a prestige, and not a business of some individuals."

Art, when became a commercial venture then it lost its prestige which resulted cultural icons as commodities for trade. And that commodification resulted a proper business in 1980s which then taught the lesson for doing so in the character of Saïto, then it got acceptance that art should remain the possession of the world at large, and not at the hands of some businessmen. Then it is pleased that Art icons should be certified by the market value and only museum should the best prices.

Just as we come in sight of the valley Jamel met us, yes, the valley was all very fine, but did we know there was nothing to eat. Nonsense, we could eat anything there. Well, the brown bread was two months old, and there was nothing else but potatoes.

There must have been milk anyhow.

Yes, there had been milk, "he suppose."

Some books are considered that they have developed the world. The books are titled with that honour by the scholars according to their will and circumstances. But there are some books which instead of changing the world leads it to the darkness. In any society it can be concluded by observing the publication of books that either it will change the world or it will cause to put it in the worst customs. In the same way, if we observe look at the books published in Pakistan, we will reach to the conclusion that they are attracting people towards religious and ethnic extremism, and nationalist thinking. That kind of mentality is being observed in Pakistani society.
