Art: A Big Business

Art very soon became a commercial venture. From bourgeois patrons to museum curators stage-managing the cult of artists in order to enhance the market value of museum, barely understood it. Similarly, entrepreneurs found profit in it. Speculators, thieves etc. created a market to sell cultural icons like commodities long ago. In the 1980s this trend toward commodities took an ominous turn during Japanese "bubble economy". At the time, there was a record investment in it by Japanese despite doubling share prices. For example, Ryohei Saito purchased Van Gogh's portrait in 1985 for $11 million. Later it vanished suddenly from museum then on loan, and later learned that he owed $24 million to govt and kept this painting to spare his heir this tax. He later dismissed it as a joke.

Understanding of the passage is fun

A representative of the museum conceded that he made an ethical appeal to him but not redressed.

Ethical appeals notwithstanding, great art will devolve into big business. Firstly, art can be certified by its market value and every "the world at large" hasn't the means of acquisition.

Art Like there is only a museum which has the funds to extend its prices. The art may disappear into private hands, but its transfer will disseminate into the hands of various investors etc. and occasionally the artist.

Ensure it to be one third of original passage
