We keep investigating people throughout life. We keep looking for friends but find enemies at every step. We have to make efforts to find a friend while enemies are readily available. Then the same question arises in our mind that who is the foe. There are many people in every person's life. One has to live with all those people. We cannot live alone. Family, relatives, neighbours, countymen, friends, loved ones and many other people are part of our life. This is a matter of whole life. We may not understand many people, still we cannot stay away from them. Many times, we have to keep the relationship due to compulsion or caution.

We tend to test people throughout our lives. Our quest for companionship persists, yet adversaries continue to cross our paths. The pursuit of friendship becomes imperative, while foes seem to be readily available. Thus, the same query arises in our minds: who, after all, is the ultimate adversary? In the life of every individual, there exist dozens or hundreds of people. Coexisting with all of them becomes incumbent. We cannot live alone. Family members, relatives, neighbours, acquaintances, colleagues, confidants, and various others continue to become part of our lives. It is an enduring affair. Numerous individuals are incomprehensible, yet we cannot escape them. At times, upholding relationships becomes an inevitable obligation dictated either by circumstances or expediency.
