

Q. 2

Precis:

currently three schools of thought existed on education. Freedom: one said students must be free even if they were bad, some said they must be controlled, and other said students remain good if they were free. The last school was above from that may be, all were not good if they were free. The development through freedom was relic of Rousseauism. Their believers thought education provided development environment and had no positive purpose. I disagreed because it seem to me unconventional from education's advantages. It would be unworldly to expect cooperation from sudden stimulation. Huge population on restricted area was attainable through technology. Socially, education would be more positive than progress opportunity and provided mental apparatus for children.
