

Money is Secondary to work

A well groomed person gives secondary importance to the monetary value in his professional life. Money has no primary significance for him. People like him tend to be amused with the gratification acquired over in their work; A professional serviceman prefers his services to the monetary reward, similarly, a religious preacher has strong affiliation with his work. Moreover, a good medical practitioner focuses on his inner motive of providing medical services rather than the fees charged for it.

Word count: (78 words.)