PRECIS:

The Passage argues that individuals who are well educated, intellectual and courageous cannot prioritize money as their sole focus, just as they cannot prioritize their meals as primary purpose of their lives. While financial success is appreciated, it should not overshadow more significant objectives. For example soldier's primary mission is to excel in combat, although he rightfully appreciates his pay. The same principle lies to clergyman whose central purpose lies in baptizing and preaching, rather than seeking payment for their services. A good doctor would prioritize saving a patient life over monetary gain. The pursuit of meaningful objectives beyond monetary gain leads to a more fulfilling and purposeful
