Question no. 2: Batch: I88 08-047

Answer: Precis:

Young People are More Able
Than Old Ones Now-A-Days

Voltaire praises in Marlborough 'that calm courage in the midst of tumult, that serenity of soul in danger, which is the greatest gift of nature for command.' One of the ancient Roman poets has pointed out that the scandal of old men at war and old men in love. On the other hand, Julius Caesar and Cromwell began their serious soldiering when well over the age of 40; Marlborough was 61 at the time of his most admired manuvre, when he forced the Ne Plus Ultra lines; Turenne's last campaign at the age of 63, is said to have been his boldest and best. Moltke, the most competent of the moderns, made his name at the age of 66 and confirmed his reputation at 70. We must remember, in making comparisons, with the past, that men develop later now-a-days; for instance, Wellington, Wolfe, Moore, Craufurd were all commissioned at the age of about 15 years, and some of them saw service soon after joining. At the same time there is no doubt that a good young general will generally beat a good old one; and the recent lowering of our generals is undoubtedly a step in the right direction, even if it may sometimes lose us prematurely a good commander.
