Paragraph:

I will not argue that his actions are right or wrong per se, but that they are understandable, do not constitute betrayal and do not make Ephialtes evil. Let's look at the events leading up. It is established in the opening scene that Spartan men are born to be soldiers, and any newborn with a less than perfectly fully abled body is immediately discarded. Not set on a different path, like farming, blacksmithing or whatever, but full on chucked in a ditch.

Precis:

Ephialtes' actions are understandable, not betrayal, and don't make him evil. Spartan society discards any newborn with physical disabilities, instead of assigning them other roles. This harsh context explains his choices.

Q no: 3 :-

Ans: Two factors contribute to Yusuf's second or third-place wins being more celebrated than some first-place wins. Firstly, Yusuf's sportsmanship and humility as shown by his ability to handle both failure and victory gracefully. Secondly, his perseverance ^{as shown by the} ~~and~~ comeback he made ~~at~~ ^{on} during a world championship event. His near-wins are hence marked by memorable events showing his determination and skill. This makes his second place wins being celebrated more than the first-place wins of his competitors.
