QUESTION: 7

TRANSLATION

An African philosopher once quoted that when Britishers colonized Africa, they had technology and we had land. . . . They said that they came to provide us with progress and we blindly believed. By the time we realized our mistake, then we had technology and they controlled our lands. Similarly, when social networks emerged, they had Facebook and whatsapp and offered it for free. We got engrossed in them only to realize that we have the social networks and they possess our freedom and personal information. Hence, the price of every free commodity is our freedom. There is no such thing as free lunch.
