

Q.2.

Significance of International law

Municipal law governs individuals; international law, states. International law works in different way. It does not affect the authority of states, but maintain a relation among them. However, some layers refuse it completely, saying that it does not fulfil the properties of nations. Besides, it contradicts with the sovereignty of a state.

But the theory of consent solves this issue, stating that every state has the right either to accept it or reject it. This shows, it has a great range of importance. Although some consider it as a sham, others do not believe that a small group would bring peace in the world.

However, no body decides the true sense of international law that it defines the boundaries of states and tries to maintain states' sovereignty and global order.

Every nation has the story of ups and downs. For this, the sense of loss and national unity are necessary. After World War Two, Japan had faced severe ordeal. Atomic bomb had already destroyed two cities, but the serious concern for Japanese was the disrespect of their King. The insulted behaviour of General Meek Arthur towards the king had alive the sense of fight among Japanese.

Although not in battle field, Japan started defeating America in every domain and at last they had achieved their lost glory within few decades.

The story has a great lesson for Pakistan.
