

Question no. 1

Precis

The misinformation through media can create a sense of confusion among people. This misinformation is further amplified by the social media, making it difficult for the people to get the authentic information. Moreover, by oversimplifying complex matters, people find it difficult to comprehend them. Similarly, the overloadedness of news can also reduce the people's ability to critically analyze the information. Further, the media also creates a sense of confusion in the societal and culture norms by conveying contradicting views. Media, in order to seek attention fabricates the content which can create a sense of polarization in the society. This happens when media remains uncensored and personal interests prevail over societal interests.
