

Q#9

Precis

Municipal law comprises of codes that governs individual's behaviors while international law founded relations among states. Individuals are in direct jurisdiction of domestic law while as name implies states are not direct subjects of international law. For international law implementation consent of states is important. In international arena no superior authority exists. It is not above states but govern relations of states. That's why often called it 'not a true law.' States have sovereignty and acceptance of international law rules threatens it. Consent theory resolved the issue that <sup>only</sup> consented rules are binding in nature. The importance of international law ranges differently as some considers it useless and others considers that <sup>its</sup> proper codification and implementation would bring peace.
