

Q 2

Precis:

As domestic law provides guidelines to oversee the behavior of individuals, international law gives a frame work to govern the behavior of states. With no social consensus and no central authority to impose sanctions, operationalization of international law is quite different. ^{moreover,} International law is a law among nations, not above them. However, some jurists does not accepts international law as a law because it lacks a proper sanction mechanism. Furthermore, the issue of sovereignty of states is resolved through theory of consensus, stating consensus of states as a pre-requisite to implement international law. Despite these views, true significance and nature of international law is not clearly justified. Some regards it as a sham; others view it as a blueprint to establish peace if a comprehensive code is framed.
