Title: Contradiction between nature of international law
and state sovereignty

Norms governing the individuals' behaviour are embodied in domestic and international law. While the latter is operated by a centralized authority. In domestic law state are above law but in international law is between them. Some lawyers do not entertain this nature of international law - owing to its characterist sanctions.

It contradicts with sovereignty of state. This contradiction can be resolved using theory of consent. So, binding to international law becomes exercise of sovereign. Its classical definition is present in Wimbledon case.

That is the reason of emergence of opposing views. However, neither view does full justice to true nature of international law.
