International law: Framework for International relations

According to the legal framework, national and international law are two different domains. The working and sanctions of these laws are quite different from each other. One works for the state while the other work for dealing in between the countries respectively. Most of the lawyers believe that international law is contradictory in terms of sovereignty and sanctions. So, this contradiction was resolved by a theory of consent which claims about the binding character of international legal norms. This is evident from the significant example happened in the past. Some believe that international law is based on difficult compromises which expands its significance for international world. But there cannot be a full justice on any view.
