Title: Ensuring the Sustainability of Success

The author conducts an interview of Sheikh Rashid of Dubai. The Sheikh believes difficulty creates strong leaders who create comfort. However this comfort leads to weak leaders who create hardship. This expresses the Sheikh's fears for the future progress of his country. The Sheikh believes the only way to prevent hard times is to cultivate leaders, and future generations. This cultivation entails educating them and instilling values of hard work, independence, and patience. Through the instilling of these values one prevents the creation of ineffectual leaders who are solely reliant on others. The author adds that to achieve further success, human capital and intellect are vital. The Sheikh's wisdom, according to the author allows societies to plan for future success, ensuring strength in difficult times.

Q7)

If you have ~~been to~~ ever travelled internationally and have been to Dubai, Qatar, Kuwait etc for a transit flight, then you would have noticed that travelers at the Japanese gate create an environment of serenity.

All of them in their movement, clothing and style, discipline, and appearance are the same. Walking past the German gate allows you to see a similar scene. Malaysia, China, Spain, Australia and the New Zealand gate all tell a similar story. More or less.

You will see national similarity and unity until you reach the Pakistani gate, defined more by its dissimilarity. Most have tired faces, you hear the sounds of crying children. Half of the people at the gate are dressed in western attire and jeans. Others are wearing shalwar kameez. You will also be able to see a bride to be with mehndi on her hands waiting for it to dry and the old aunt entourage burdened by the weight of their dresses walking about. At one corner you will find a young ^{migrant} labourer sunk in his chair with a scarf on his shoulder and children's imported sweets in his hands. Somewhere else you will spot suited bureaucrat travelers of the business class section.
