Translation

If you have ever travelled internationally and had a transit flight from Dubai, Qatar, Kuwait or similar places, you have noticed that the atmosphere is serene at the gate where passengers were waiting their flight to Japan. And they all seem to be in similar manners, attire, discipline and appearance. As you stroll past the check-in gate, you will find the same scenario, and if you visit the gates for Malaysia, China, Spain, Australia and New Zealand, the situation will be more or less same, a sense of national uniformity will be evident. However, when you reach the Pakistani gate, you will witness a diversity rather than a uniformity. Most of people have worn-out faces. Sounds of crying children. Some are dressed in half-shirts and jeans and some in shalwar kameez. Somewhere, a newly married bride with henna adorned hands eagerly waits to meet her husband. While elsewhere elderly mothers-in-law walking with joint pain.

On one corner you will find young men who have come ~~at~~ to work abroad, carrying turbans and holding foreign currencies in their hands. And in business class, there are business travellers dressed in safari suits, looking like bureaucrats.
