Title:-

Ephialtes and the Persian Victory over Sparta

According to the author, Ephialtes - a villain of an action film 300 - was morally right. In Sparta, men were supposed to be soldiers. Newborns, who were not fit enough, were discarded. Ephialtes was one of them. However, his parents, out of his love, took him away from Sparta. He was trained by his father to become a good soldier and to get accepted by the people of Sparta. When opportunity came, he begged to join the army to fight the Persians. He, despite, having good spear skills was rejected again. The author opines that his addition in the army would have definitely given an edge to Sparta. Nevertheless, completely broken, he went to the Persian army, where they let him join the army with awards and uniform. Consequently, the Persian army defeated Sparta. ✓

Q. 3:-

(i)
Patton was considered a controversial military figure because of his different and unconventional views especially on WWII. He was of the view that United States was wrong to defeat Nazi Germany; she should have attacked Moscow instead.

(ii)

In the book "Patton: A Biography" by Alan Axelrod, Alan has just examined (analyzed) the Patton's view on World War II. He has neither justified nor opposed his perspective.

(iii)

If Patton had captured Moscow, it would have been risky and difficult. It would have changed the war's outcome and prevented the happening of the Cold War.

(v)

Yes, there is a valuable lesson that the leaders may infer from Patton's views and that lesson is to think outside the box and challenge conventional wisdom.

Dialogue:-

Sarah greeted John and asked what career path he wanted to pursue after graduation. John was perplexed whether to go into finance or pursue a career in technology. Sarah exclaimed

both are great options and asked what interests him about finances. John ~~said~~ answered he loved analyzing data and predicting market trends. However, technology offered endless opportunities for innovation and creativity.
Sarah agreed that technology was constantly evolving and suggested that he could combine his interests. John ~~explained~~ liked the idea and said it would allow him to leverage his skills in both areas. He thanked Sarah. Sarah replied with pleasure and advised him to follow his passion.
