

Humans Cannot Live Alone

Humans are inherently interdependent on each other from birth to death. We need assistance for basic necessities like food, shelter, clothing, education and livelihood. We depend on family, community, laws and social structures created by others. Even as adults, we require friends and social institutions to secure our rights and share life's experience.