

Your language is good mashallah.
But you must overcome the following mistakes if you want to pass your essay.

Topic: Economic Imperialism:

Fact or Fiction

Mistakes are following

1. Introduction

- * Work on your outline making
  - * Remain aligned to the topic
  - * Avoid "how" expressions
  - * Avoid 1st and 2nd person pronouns in the academic writing
- Thesis Statement: Economic Imperialism is a fact, as wealthy nations use power, financial assistance, and trade agreements to maintain control over developing countries.
- Must work on your topic comprehension

II. Understanding Economic Imperialism

Rephrase your main

III. How Core Countries Hegemonize Peripheries:

Most attend the tutorial session for further suggestions and mistakes

as loans and debt keep developing nations dependent

Rephrase it

(b) Policies of global organizations impacts poor countries.

(c) Multinational Corporations exploits resources and labor market.

(d) Trade agreements favors strong economies at the expense of weaker ones.

This is the actual asked part.

Increase its number of arguments to substantiate your stance.

Date: / / 20

Not the asked part at all

iv. Impacts on Developing Countries:

- (a) loss of economic sovereignty due to debt.
- (b) Increase of economic disparity by agreements and policies.
- (c) Over-exploitation of resources harms the environment.
- (d) Restrain local business development through dependency on imports.

v. Debunking the reality of Economic Imperialism:

- (a) Developing countries have a choice.

Rebuttal: Economic dependency make it hard to have the right choices.

- (b) Foreign investment leads towards development.

Rebuttal: The funds often come with strict conditions that benefit the lender.

- (c) Globalization promotes equal opportunities for both rich and poor countries.

Rebuttal: Wealthier nations often shape globalization rules to suit their interest.

In today's interconnected world, the concept of economic imperialism raises questions about the true nature of global power dynamics. Unlike traditional imperialism, which involved direct political control, economic imperialism subtly uses financial influences, trade agreements, and multinational corporations to exert control over weaker economies. As economist Joseph Stiglitz states,

"Globalization has made it easier for rich to get richer and poor to get poorer."

many argue that these global relationships are built on mutual benefit and shared growth. However, a closer look reveals that wealthy nations often use these mechanisms to keep poorer countries dependent, reinforcing their own economic dominance. This quiet but profound form of dominance shapes international relations, leaving developing countries in a cycle of dependency that limits their path to true economic independence.

Date: ___/___/20__

Mon Tue Wed Thu Fri Sat

Economic imperialism refers to the practice where powerful nations exert control over weaker economies through financial means rather than direct political domination, often manifested through debt, trade agreements, and the influence of multinational corporations and global financial institutions. This concept originated in the late 19th and early 20th century during colonialism. By recognizing how powerful nations exerted control over developing countries, we can promote fairer trade practices and empower these nations to negotiate better terms in international agreements.

Doesn't look like a topic sentence.

One of the most powerful tools through which wealthy countries exert control over poorer nations is debt. Loans extended by institutions such as International Monetary Fund (IMF).

Date: 1 / 20

Mon Tue Wed Thu Fri Sat

and World Bank (WB), although often presented as aid, create lasting financial dependency. As these loans usually come with some conditions that compel borrowing countries to adopt austerity measures, reduce social spending. Economist John Perkins described debt as a "weapon" that ensures developing countries remain beholden to creditors.

Where are you concluding sentence?

Global financial institutions are another crucial mechanism through which wealthy nations maintain control. The IMF, World Bank and World Trade Organizations impose structural adjustment programs (SAPs) on borrowing nations, mandating economic reforms that often lead to negative consequences for local economies, and reduce the capacity of government to invest in essential services. As the "Latin American countries" struggling with economic dependency due to debt crisis.

Trade practices between developed and developing nations further

Date:    /    / 20  

Mon Tue Wed Thu Fri Sat

exemplify economic imperialism. Core countries often dictate the terms of global trade agreements, creating agreements that protect their industries while undermining those of poorer ones. For example, high tariffs are frequently imposed on processed goods from developing countries, while raw materials are allowed to enter developed markets with little to no tariffs. This practice discourages the development of local industries in poor countries and perpetuates their role as suppliers of low-value commodities.

The impacts of economic imperialism on developing nations is profound and multifaceted. Economically, the conditions attached to loans and the structures of trade agreements often hinder growth and development. This leads to the loss of their economic sovereignty, and bounding them to the decisions of core countries.

Date:      /      / 20

Mo Tu We Th Fr Sa

Socially, these economic pressures can exacerbate inequality within developing nations, as wealth generated from exports primarily benefits a small elite while the majority remain impoverished. Due to all these the rich becomes more richer and poor becomes poorer, which can cause social disparity and disturbs the balance of society.

Moreover, The prioritization of foreign interest over local needs often leads in social unrest and instability, as citizens become increasingly frustrated with their governments' inability to deliver on basic services. This situation creates a breeding ground for conflict, further destabilizing regions that are already vulnerable.

hastly, these practices discourages development of local industries. As a result, developing countries miss opportunities for economic advancement and remain locked in a state of dependency on wealthier nations for their economic viability. These trade imbalances are not just economic arrangements; they reinforce a hierarchy in which rich nations benefit disproportionately while stifling the growth of developing countries.

Despite the overwhelming evidence of economic imperialism's impact, some argue that it is merely a myth. They contend that developing countries engage willingly in trade and financial agreements, implying that they possess autonomy and choices in these relationships. While it is true, countries can make choices, the options available to them are often heavily influenced by constraints imposed by wealthier nations.

Critics also claim that globalization has leveled the playing field, providing opportunities for all nations to grow economically. But, the benefits of globalization are not distributed evenly; rather they tend to concentrate wealth and power in hands of few, perpetuating a system that favors the already privileged. Thus, viewing economic imperialism as fiction distracts from the urgent need to address these disparities and challenge the status quo.

Date:    /    / 20

Mon Tue Wed Thu Fri Sat

In conclusion, economic imperialism is a stark reality that manifests through debt dependency, the influence of global financial institutions, and unfair trade practices. The impact of this form of imperialism is deeply felt in developing nations, where economic policies and conditions imposed by wealthier countries stifle growth and exacerbate social inequalities. While some may argue that it is a myth, as the world moves forward, it is crucial to advocate for fairer economic practices that promote genuine autonomy and equitable growth for all nations, rather than perpetuating a system that benefits only the few at the expense of the many.

Date: __/__/20__