The <sup>author</sup> speaker advocates for peace over total war, stressing that modern nuclear weapons have made full-scale war irrational and catastrophic. He argues that the sheer destructiveness of nuclear arsenals, which can cause irreversible harm to the environment and future generations, renders the concept of total war irrational.

Although vast amounts of money are spent on nuclear weapons to maintain peace through deterrence, the speaker questions whether accumulating idle stockpiles is the best approach. He calls peace the "necessary rational end of rational men" highlighting the need for self-reflection at both the individual and national levels. Doubt around world peace and the belief in war's inevitability can be dangerous. He encourages people to set clear goals
