Title: The Value of Purpose over Profit

A well-educated, intellectual or brave person cannot make money the primary focus of his life. While it is natural to enjoy making money, it should not overshadow the higher goals one strives for. For example, a good soldier prioritizes winning battles, a clergyman aims to preach and baptize, and a doctor seeks to cure the sick rather than focusing on earning fees. In all cases, those with strong character place their mission and work above financial reward, though the latter remains important, but always secondary.
