

The Priority of Purpose

It is impossible for a well-educated, intellectual person to prioritize wealth above all else. While making money can be enjoyable, it should not be the primary objective. Just as a good soldier's main goal is to win battles, not receive pay, or a clergyman's objective is to baptize and preach, not receive payments, a person's focus should be on their work, not financial gain. Fees and payment are secondary to the main mission, and well-trained individuals would prioritize success in their field over financial reward.
