

Healthy minds and their purpose to work?

For an educated, intellectual and courageous person money alone cannot be a primary and sole concern of this thoughts, similar to the place of food in one's everyday life, necessary intake yet not major goal. Nevertheless, all healthy minds work to earn but it's not the fiscal reward rather their work itself that adds value to their achievement and mental satisfaction. For instance, a soldier, a clergyman or a doctor desires for something more than money - winning battles, to preach, to cure the sick respectively. Such brave and well-trained professionals associate intrinsic value to their work, where work their job is first and fee is second despite their recognition of the importance of financial rewards.
