

Memoona Khan

Batch # 137

The Primacy of Purpose in Professional Life

A well-educated or brave person cannot make money the central focus of their life, just as they wouldn't with their meals, though both are important. Healthy minded individuals enjoy earning money but value something greater. For example, a good soldier's primary goal is to fight well, not merely to earn pay. Similarly, a clergyman prioritizes preaching over payment, and doctors aim to heal more than collect fees. All rightly trained professionals place their work above monetary reward, recognizing that while money is significant, it should never overshadow the purpose of their duties.