A single image of a child covered in a dust can shift global opinion more than the hundreds of diplomatic speeches. The media is massaging the modern warfare by altering the thinking of global voices. This conflict stems from the early 20th century over competing national claims to the same land, intensifying under British rule. The 1947 UN partition plan's rejection by Arabs led to the 1948 war, Israel's creation, and the mass displacement of Palestinians, called as Nakba. Ongoing disputes over borders, refugees, and Jerusalem have fueled decades of violence and failed peace efforts. Since, then, media has been the mainstream in reporting real-time coverage, shaping global narrative, highlighting humanitarian crises, engaging citizen journalists, promoting propaganda, undermining the atrocities in Palestine, mobilizing protest in other countries, and moderating content and censorship. However, media must emphasize on encouraging factual data regardless of threats, staying unbiased in terms of press and delivering the clear picture of right and wrong.
