Title: Civil Service: Between public Duty and Personal Branding.

From Public Service to Personal Branding

06/20

In Pakistan, the civil service, once regarded as a noble avenue of public service, has gradually transformed into a blend of career security, social prestige, and personal branding. While many aspire to it for stability, influence, and respect, others pursue it obsessively, sacrificing personal well-being in the process. The rise of social media has further reshaped its image, turning some bureaucrats into lifestyle influencers who showcase glamour alongside governance. This dual identity raises concerns that the allure of appearances may overshadow the real, demanding responsibilities of administration.

The writer humorously connects food with everyday situation in Pakistan. For example, when it rains, people immediately crave pakoras; during heatwave, falooda becomes the solution and in times of sadness or depression, haleem is seen as the ultimate comfort food. These playful examples show how food has become an emotional response to all circumstances, whether good or bad.

Answer no 2

The author explains that air cricket in Pakistan are often more about the snacks than the sport itself. While the game can be stressful and tense for fans, the real joy lies in eating gol gappas, chaat, or other snacks outside the stadium. This shows that, for many Pakistanis, the match is only an excuse to enjoy food, making it a central part of the experience rather than the game.

Answer no 3

The author seems to hold a critical yet humorous view of amusement parks in Pakistan. He suggests that although they exist, they are not very enjoyable or fulfilling. Instead of being thrilling, the rides can even be uncomfortable, with one ride enough to cause back pain. This shows that amusement parks are seen as poorly maintained and unattractive, which is why people prefer food outings instead.

Q4

(Answer No 4)

This statement means that Pakistanis are so focused on food as their main form of entertainment that it is affecting both their physical and intellectual growth. On one hand, excessive eating lead to increasing waistlines and health issues, while on the other hand, people are not broadening broadening their minds, developing hobbies, or expanding exploring cultural activities; In other words, society is overindulging in food but neglecting personal and social progress.
