Helen Keller in her autobiography wished about her life; if she were given her sight back for three days, how would she live those days. She says that on first day she would like to see her relatives to feel the depth of their love. On second day, she wants to see the ambience of nature: the sun rays, trees, the chroma of flowers and the elevation of sky. On third day, she wants to see the clock of society: wakening markets, meeters, and architecture to admire the wisdom of man. To her this three-day gift would be equivalent the sight of whole life.
