Attacking the Person, Not the Argument

The author believes that people often attack others personally when they cannot answer their arguments. A classic example is the courtroom tactics of discrediting the opposing lawyer when no rebuttal exist. A story of young lawyer Lincoln shows how he won a case by mocking his opponent's shirt instead of responding with legal argument. This is ^{called} ad hominem fallacy which is very old. This passage points out that discussing a leader's health like Roosevelt or Eisenhower can be reasonable but rejecting Roosevelt's policies just because he was called Cripple is a harsh form of ad hominem.

If Franz Stigler

had shot down Charles Brown's B-17, he would have died and their story of friendship would have never existed.

4)

Answer

Act of Kindness and courage can transform the relationships between former enemies by creating mutual respects and lasting bonds. For example, Zāhid Haftlang risked his life to save Najja Abud during the Iran-Iraq war and met after eighteen years in Canada laughing, crying and embracing. Similarly, Franz Stigler saved Charles Brown's life in war and as a result their friendship lasted till death.

Such acts demonstrate that courage with humanity can create friendships across enemy lines.

Answer

True bravery is not fighting with courage but acting ethically, protecting life and maintaining humanity during war situation. Ahsan Malik defended Kamalpur receiving respect from his enemy. Zahid Haftlang risked his life to save a wounded soldier. Field Marshal Rommel defied Hitler's orders, protecting prisoners and civilians, showing ethical bravery. True bravery respects life, upholds dignity and inspires others beyond the battlefield.
