Make a precise of the following Passage; also suggest a suitable title.

Horsemanship as a Social Institution

The Connection between humans and these domesticated animals has always reflected societal values beyond their usefulness. In medieval Europe, the affiliation between humans and horses were considered a significant social institution that shaped war, trade, and daily survival. The breeding and training of horses required specialized skills possessed by master horsemen. They were capable of understanding a horse's temperament, strength, and suitability of different tasks. The most important of all were farriers, expert blacksmiths who treated hoof diseases, corrected gait problems, and advised on medicine care. Their role held a unique social standing between common laborers and high social classes. Their workshops functioned as hubs of learning through observation and practice. Horsemanship was considered an art shaped by regional beliefs. Some regions emphasize authority while others focus on cooperation. The best horsemen were those who understood their horses so well that they achieved perfect harmony between human and animal action.

The historian^{Paused} looked directly at the audience, and said, "The fall of ancient Civilization cannot be attributed to a single clause. However, we must consider several interconnected factors, including environmental degradation, economic instability, and political corruption. Moreover, the notion that these societies simply vanished is absurd. They transformed, evolved, and, in many cases, their descendants continue to thrive today. When examining primary sources from that era, particularly letters written by merchants, farmers, and government officials, we discover a far more complex narrative than traditional textbook suggest."
