

General instructions to be followed to pass essay

Rabia Anwar

Batch: 077

LMS: 38930

1- Spend time on rightly comprehension of the topic, you won't pass the essay unless and until you addressed the asked part

A Civilization is Measured by How It Treats Its Weakest Members

Outline

2- Try to make your main heading in the outline from the words in the question statement

1. Introduction

1.1. True measure of civilization lies

3- Try to add hook in the introduction. The length of introduction must be of 2 sides

1.2. Weakest groups reveal the real

4- your topic sentence in your argument must be aligned with the ending sentence

1.3. Thesis Statement

5- Avoid firstly, secondly, thirdly etc. in outline

2. Philosophical Foundations

2.1. Justice begins with the vulnerable

6- add references in your arguments with proper source. Go for diversification of references

2.2. Societies exist to provide protection

Points are not clear

2.3. Compassion and moral duty as

7- Do not add new idea or point in Conclusion

Foundations of civilization

8- You won't pass the essay if make more than 4-5 grammatical mistakes

3. Identification of the Weakest Members

3.1. Children

3.2. Women

3.3. Minorities

3.4. Elderly and disabled

3.5. Poor and unemployed youth

9- outlines that are not self explanatory or does not aligned with the essay statement are liable to mark 0 and the essay would become null and void

10- always try to be relevant to the topic, if even your 1 or 2 arguments are irrelevant, the examiner would not pass your essay.

Identification is vague as well.

3.6. Victims of crime and socially marginalized

4. Social Responsibility and Human Dignity

- 4.1. Equal worth of all individuals
- 4.2. Providing basic rights and services as moral obligations
- 4.3. Vulnerable groups remain invisible without societal action.

5. Feminist Lens

- 5.1. Women as indicators of social health
- 5.2. Gender-based violence as societal failure

6. Minorities as a Test of Fairness

- 6.1. Minority vulnerability
- 6.2. Protection of religious, cultural, political rights
- 6.3. Equal citizenship reflects societal maturity

7. Governance and Protection of the Weak

- 7.1. Corruption and inefficiency harm vulnerable groups

7.2. Importance of functional public services

7.3. Inclusive and responsive governance

8. Justice System and Vulnerable Groups

8.1. Legal access barriers

8.2. Criminalization of poverty and vulnerability

8.3. Legal aid and rehabilitative programs

9. Economic Inclusion and Social Protection

9.1. Poverty and inequality

9.2. Welfare, education, and employment programs

9.3. Economic growth meaningful only if it reaches the weakest

10. Humanitarian Realities and Practical Examples

10.1. Natural disasters expose inequalities

10.2. Daily-wage earners, street children, widows, minorities suffer first

10.3. Role of civil society in addressing gaps

11. Common Societal Mistakes

- 11.1. Ignoring invisible suffering
- 11.2. Treating welfare as charity
- 11.3. Overemphasis on infrastructure
- 11.4. Excluding vulnerable voices from policy making
- 11.5. Institutional prejudice

12. Way Forward

13. Conclusion

Bachay you haven't understood the topic at all. You were supposed to present the arguments of how civilization is measured by its treatment towards the weakest.

Must work on your topic comprehension
Improve your phrasing
Word selection must be improved
Paper presentation is good. Keep it up.

Must attend the tutorial session for further suggestions and mistakes

The Essay

A civilization is often judged by its architecture, wealth, or technological progress. Yet these visible achievements do not reflect its true character. The real test of a society appears in the way it treats people who cannot fight for themselves.

When children, women, minorities, elderly citizens, disabled persons, and the poor live with dignity and protection, that society can claim to be truly civilised. As John Stuart Mill noted, "A civilization is ~~measured by the degree of its concern for the welfare of its weakest members.~~ Never provide information in your introduction.

~~Consequently, when the vulnerable are ignored, exploited, or silenced, even the richest nations become~~

~~This cannot be considered as an~~ standard introduction ~~truth is revealed through the dignity, care, and justice it offers to the weakest members.~~

Human history ~~contains~~ Should repeated reminders that justice must begin with the vulnerable. Philosophers and social thinkers have long argued that societies exist to provide protection and fairness for all members, especially those who cannot defend their rights. Therefore, the moral duty of a state is to reduce suffering and ensure equal treatment. Ethical reasoning emphasizes that the strength of a civilization lies in how it safeguards marginalized people. In this sense, compassion and fairness are not signs of weakness; they are the foundation of moral intelligence and social stability.

Language is good.

The weakest members of society include who lack power, resources, or representation. Children depend entirely on adults for safety, education, and adults for safety, education, and nourishment. Similarly, women face violence, discrimination, and economic inequality that limit their opportunities and security. As Simone de Beauvoir argued, "One is not born, but rather becomes, a woman," highlighting how social structures shape vulnerability. Minorities often experience ~~exclud~~ exclusion based on religion, ethnicity, or social status. Likewise, elderly individuals and persons with disabilities frequently encounter neglect and lack of access to basic services. In addition, the poor, unemployed youth, and victims of crime represent groups whose suffering is often ignored or invisible. The condition of these groups serves as the clearest measure of a society's moral priorities.

A healthy society recognizes that people are unequal in strength and resources but equal in worth. Providing food, shelter, health-care, and education is not an act of generosity, it is a matter of human dignity. Civilizations that fail to ensure these basic rights create social divisions that later become sources of conflict. Moreover, weak and marginalized communities often remain invisible, and their suffering continues to be unnoticed unless society takes deliberate steps to protect them. Upholding human dignity is therefore central to measuring the true strength of a civilization. Women serve as a significant indicator of civilizational health. They face multiple layers of vulnerability, including unpaid domestic work, caregiving responsibilities, limited economic opportunities, and restrictions on mobility. When societies fail to protect women from violence, harassment, forced marriages, or social discrimination, they reveal structural weaknesses in both moral and political systems. Empowering women strengthens families, promotes economic growth, and contributes to social stability. Consequently, a civilization cannot claim progress when half of its population remains unequal or unsafe.

You are just beating around the bush. You are targeting the topic.

Minorities offer another essential test of fairness. Vulnerable minority groups depend on the moral commitments of the majority for their security. Civilizations that protect minorities feel safe, respected, and included, reflects a mature and just society. As Martin Luther King Jr. said, "Injustice anywhere is a threat to justice everywhere." Conversely, when minorities live in fear of discrimination or violence, it exposes deep flaws in societal values and governance. Therefore, protecting minority rights is both moral and practical necessity for a stable civilization.

Governance plays a crucial role in protecting the weak. Corruption, inefficient institutions, and weak public services harm vulnerable groups and disproportionately. Hospitals, schools, and local governments that fail to function effectively create barriers that disadvantaged populations cannot overcome. Strong governance, efficient institutions, and responsive local authorities serve as shields for those without influence. Furthermore, public policies must be inclusive and attentive to the needs of marginalized citizens to ensure fairness and social cohesion.

Justice systems also reflect the strength of civilization. Weak and poor communities often struggle to access legal protection because of high costs, lengthy procedures, or bureaucratic obstacles. Criminalizing poverty, addiction, homelessness exacerbates social inequality. Therefore, a civilized society ensures equal protection for all citizens through legal aid, victim supports, and rehabilitative programs. Fair and humane justice strengthens social trust and fosters long-term stability.

Economic inclusion is equally important. Poverty becomes permanent when social safety nets are inadequate. Civilizations that invest in welfare, employment opportunities, and accessible education prevent vulnerable groups from falling into cycles of deprivation. As Nelson Mandela emphasized, "Overcoming poverty is not gesture of charity, it is an act of justice."

Economic growth is meaningful only when it reaches the bottom of society. Societies that prioritize human development alongside infrastructure build stability, reduce crime, and increase productivity.

Real-life situations reveal these truths most clearly. Natural disasters such as floods, earthquakes, and pandemics expose deep inequalities. Daily-wage earners, street children, widows, and minority groups are often the first to suffer and the last to recover. In such circumstances, civil society frequently steps in to fill gaps left by the state, demonstrating both the strength of communities and the shortcomings of governance. A strong civilization responds quickly, compassionately, and effectively, ensuring that the weakest members are not left behind.

Many societies make mistakes that harm vulnerable populations. Ignoring invisible suffering, such as malnutrition, mental health issues, or domestic abuse, undermines long-term development. Treating welfare as charity rather than a right creates dependency and stigma. Overemphasis on infrastructure while neglecting human needs produces an imbalanced society. Policies designed without input from affected communities often fail to address real challenges. Moreover, prejudice against women, minorities, and the poor can become institutionalized, further marginalizing those who are already disadvantaged.

To create a civilization that is truly just, societies must take deliberate steps to protect the weakest. Reliable healthcare, accessible education, and social protection are fundamental requirements. Reforms in policing and justice system ensure fair treatment for all. Women, minorities, children, the elderly, and persons with disabilities must have equal opportunities, safety, and recognition. Investments in local governance and the care economy help address vulnerabilities close to communities. Ultimately, empathy, fairness, and accountability must guide the actions of both individuals and institutions.

In conclusion, the greatness of a civilization is not measured by its wealth, military power, or technological achievements. It is measured by its humanity, justice, and compassion. Societies rise when their weakest members are protected and empowered. Children should be safe, women respected, minorities included, and the poor supported. A civilization achieves true progress when no one is invisible, unprotected, or left behind. Its moral and social health is revealed through the care it provides to those least able to defend themselves.

Franklin D. Roosevelt captured this truth when he stated:

“The test of our progress is not whether we add more to the abundance of those who have much; it is whether we provide enough for those who have too little.”

This reminder emphasizes that true advancement is measured not in wealth or power, but in compassion, protection, and inclusion for the most vulnerable, and this remains the most enduring standard of human achievement.