ESSAY

Democracy is meant to give people a voice, but in Pakistan the people often feel unheard. It promises stability and rights yet many people feel those promises keep getting broken. Every few months the country experiences protests, shutdowns and clashes that show how fragile its democratic system has become. Ordinary citizens watch inflation rise, jobs shrink and political fights deepen and this struggle shapes their every day life. Democratic unrest means the constant tension between the public and the state which includes protests on streets, institutional instability, high economic pressure and a serious breakdown of trust. In Pakistan today, this unrest is not accidental; it is produced by economic hardship, social frustration, weak governance and widening political divides. These problems affect daily life and make the system shaky for both citizens and institutions. Many factors are pushing this unrest and inflation remains one of the top triggers of public anger. Unemployment continues to rise especially among youth, corruption and poor governance weaken public trust. Political divisions deepen daily and basic services like electricity and public transport fail repeatedly, causing more protests. At the same time, this unrest produces serious consequences which include economy slows down, investors pull back, daily business suffers, institutions lose credibility and the society becomes more polarised. These conditions show how democratic unrest is shaping the present of Pakistan and influencing its future. Democratic unrest in Pakistan results from deep economic, social, and political pressures and produces serious consequences for national stability and public life.

Firstly, soaring inflation, economic hardship and the rising cost of living have been a primary driver of democratic unrest in Pakistan. This economic pressure links directly to public disat-

-isfaction with governance and policy failures.

Too many ideas in a single paragraph

Ordinary citizens struggle to pay for basic necessities such as food, medicine, electricity and fuel which increases their frustration. The rising prices push more people to join protests, strikes and demonstrations in major cities.

For example, in 2025, protests erupted across Karachi, Lahore and Islamabad due to surging food and fuel prices. These economic hardships often compound with unemployment and service failures, creating widespread unrest. Hence, economic difficulties directly trigger public protests and form a central reason for the current democratic instability in Pakistan.

Secondly, high youth unemployment and limited job opportunities further fuel unrest across the country. Young people, who make up significant portion of the population of Pakistan more than 60 percent feel disillusioned when they cannot find decent work despite completing their education. This frustration translates into political agitation. A study in 2024 showed that rising youth unemployment was a key factor in protests in urban centres. The lack of economic prospects make youth more receptive to political mobilization particularly when they perceive inequality and government failure. Therefore, youth unemployment not only increases dissatisfaction but also becomes a direct cause of recurring democratic unrest in Pakistan.

Furthermore, perceived corruption and poor governance weaken trust in institutions and push people toward unrest. Citizens increasingly feel that political leaders misuse public funds, favor allies and avoid accountability.

This perception fuels demonstrations and political agitation as people demand transparency and better governance. Pakistan fell two places in 2024 annual corruption report index. Hence, corruption and mismanagement are critical contributors to political unrest.

Additionally, political polarization and institutional interference undermine democratic processes. Deep divisions among political parties prevent consensus building and cause the argument substantially low

policy shifts. Citizens see these conflicts play out in media and public spaces increasing frustration and prompting protests. In 2025, Bangladesh witnessed demonstrations driven by both political disputes and perceptions of regional neglect. Such polarization amplifies mistrust in government. Therefore, political conflict and institutional weakness remain key drivers of democratic instability.

Similarly, failures in public services and infrastructure contribute to citizen frustration. Frequent load shedding, poor transport and limited access to clean water directly affect daily life. In July 2024, protests erupted in Karachi over prolonged power outages in hottest summer record heatwaves. Service failures reinforce public anger and encourage intensifying unrest. Hence the breakdown of essential services fuels political instability.

Moreover, economic shocks related to external debt. Fiscal pressure and limited exports worsen public discontent. IMF recommended tax hikes and austerity measures in 2024-2025 triggered unrest as ordinary citizens struggled with higher living costs. As fiscal shades directly contribute to instability and unrest.

In addition, social inequalities and regional disparities drive disillusionment with the democratic system. The clashes over canal issue in Sindh and Punjab, the NFC award distribution, clash resources, uneven development and limited opportunities in rural areas create frustration. In 2020, protests in Balochistan and Sindh were largely attributed to regional marginalization and perceived bias in resource allocation. Social inequality therefore acts as a structural cause of democratic unrest.

Last but not the least, weak rule of law and failure of institutional checks cause citizens to lose faith in governance. Misuse of power, political favoritism and slow justice exacerbate public frustration. Misuse of these powers prompted protest and criticism of government institutions. Consequently, weak institutions are a major underlying factor of democratic instability in Pakistan.

Pakistan democratic unrest is driven by intertwined economic, political and social causes which have certain consequences which not only affect citizens daily life but also undermine public confidence in democracy.

First of all, these democratic failures are visible in economic sphere of Pakistani society - Economic activity suffers as business halt and trade slows down. In late 2024, daily economic losses were estimated at PKR 190 billion due to closures and strikes. This reduces income for business and workers, increasing public frustration. Hence, political instability directly impacts the economy.

Moreover, investor confidence declines during periods of unrest. Domestic and foreign investors view instability as risky, delaying or cancelling investment plans. In 2024, several international companies shut down due to policy paralysis. As a result, economic growth and job creation are negatively affected.

Additionally, public trust in institutions erodes when democratic unrest is frequent. Citizens see corruption, political favouritism and inefficiency repeatedly reducing faith in government, judiciary and law enforcement. This lack of trust makes governance more difficult and contributes to further instability.

Similarly, everyday life is disrupted during protests and strikes. Schools, public transport and markets close, affecting millions of people's routines. For example, transport blockades on 8 Dec 2025 caused delays for students and workers alike. These disruptions amplify public frustration and unrest.

Furthermore, social divisions deepen as unrest continues. Regional and community tensions rise when certain groups feel neglected or marginalized. Protests in Balochistan and Sindh in 2025 highlighted grievances over unequal development. This polarization weakens social cohesion and long term stability.

Moreover, development projects stall due to policy paralysis. Governments focus on managing immediate unrest rather than planning reforms. Social economic and development plans were delayed which includes CPEC also. This shows the slow in national growth.

In addition, small businesses and daily wage earners suffer income losses during unrest. Also, brain drain accelerates as skilled professionals consider leaving the country. Political and economic instability prompts youth and educated workers to seek opportunities abroad. This loss of talent and small businesses reduces long term capacity and weakens national development.

In conclusion, democratic unrest in Pakistan reflects a complex web of economic, social and political pressures that cannot be ignored. The causes from rising inflation and youth employment to corruption and weak governance have created repeated cycles of protests and dissatisfaction.

These tensions produce serious consequences including economic losses, disruption in daily life and weakened institutions.

Clearly, democratic unrest is not a distant concern but a pressing reality shaping the nation's present and future.

Therefore, there is utmost need to address the root cause of these issues to restore stability and fortify the democratic system of Pakistan.
